that the se for it was a without a time, without a large the Gebase olitude is that State which those who are best acquainted with Human Nature, think the hardest to be borne. I believe very sew have question'd this Truth, especially after they have been instructed therein by Experience. To say the Verity, there cannot be a more Experience. To fay the Verity, there cannot be a more one Trial of an ordinary Person's Patience, than tave him long with himself. The Reason of this ally appears, if we vouchsafe the Matter ever so a Consideration. For is it not clear, that, generalized by the Objects they see, or the Discourtey hear? and thus moving altogether according the Direction of inserior and exterior Things, they by long Habit made incapable of thinking, either heir own or of Beings of a superior Nature. To est therefore that a plain ordinary Person should be the solitude chearfully, is as ridiculous as if you ald put him upon Diving, Flying, or whatever carry'd him into an Element different from that which he was accustom'd.

The ancient Hermits, and those Philosophers who e affected to seclude themselves from the World, as presented to speculate on the most sublime ects, and to employ themselves either in a Kind of arick Devotion, or in Mysterious Inquiries into hidden Recesses of Nature. And such of them ally quitted Society thro an eager Inclination to Employments usually succeeded, and became out for triumphing over most of the Vices incite Mankind, and for very enlighten'd Underdings. Neither is there any Thing in this strange, robable, or at all superior to Nature. For the Causes which to the Herd of Mankind render tude se tedious and tormenting, to Minds of ano-Cast make it both pleasant and profitable, invitad instructing. Hence it is that great Discove-in Mechanick and Common Arts are made by neet to busy Men, who have had their Parts shard by Practice, whereas in all the superior Sciences are indebted for the many Improvements made in to Lovers of Solitude, Men of a refin'd and templative Genius. By this Mixture of Tempers All-wise Ruler of the Universe has provided for general Benefit of the Species, and for the full sleyment of all Kinds of Spirits.

hefe Confiderations help us to explain also than penfity which all Deceivers, Impostors, and Falfe phets, shew to these Retreats. For fince the true slove Solitude, fuch as would pass for Sages muft susse affect it; and if Men really inspired dwelt befert, and preached in Fields, those who pre-to Inspiration will repair to Fields also; and imithose Preachers in Exteriors, will from thence Occasion to delude the Vulgar into an Opinion, the Groves and Commons are Places peculiarly , and themselves indued with Spirit from above. The have been in all Ages both Sorts of People; is to fay, there have been good Men, Lovers of itement, who spent their Days in the Improve-t of their Intellectual Faculties, and in giving ht to Mankind; and there have been also lead to the state of their Committee Committ enders to Divine Commissions; Artful Cheats, withdrew that they might have Lessure to study Impostures; and Men of Fraud, who by fee to leve would suggest their Possession of those tues which are peculiarly the Growth of Solitude. & Men, therefore, who never judge by Appeara, allow nothing to the Love of Restrement, unit appears to have some Meritorious Motive. demn in the Lump all Hermits as Impostors, all demn in the Lump all Hermits as Impostors, and this as lazy, inactive, luxurious Drones; neither, in the Votaries to Superfiction, credit every Preder to extraordinary Sanctity, every high conceited imant of Inspiration, or every hot-headed Man who firs himself qualify'd to refine on the Gospel, and up himself the a lefter Legislator, a Restorer of the up himself for a leffer Legislator, a Reftorer of the mation, and Nobody knows what. They take Thing in its Circumstances into their Consideraand decide on the Whole, not from the View Part, set either in a strong or false Light. But the a long and lasting Solitude be so incompatible with the Tempers of most Men, yet grave and folid Tempers can not only bear with it fometimes, but also naturally delight in and require it. We all know how pleasant after the Fatigue of the Day we find an Evening Refreshment with a Friend. Of the fame Nature, the more exquifice, are the Enjoyments which Men have in communing with themselves, and therefore such as never acquaint themselves with Solitude certainly miss the greatest and most noble Plea-fure of which our Nature is capable. A Satisfaction to much the more estimable for that depending on our felves it is the less liable to Accidents, requires no mighty Pains, no troublesome Preparations, begins at our Will, and ends when we please. An Employment, which in some measure anticipates our lu ure State, and gives us an Idea of the Occupations of an unbodied Spirit. Then we know no Limitation, feel no Restraints, suffer our Thoughts to roam throughout, and even beyond the Limits of the Universe, recall past Years, nay past Ages, or suffer a probable Train of unhappen'd Events to pass before us in Review. Thus engaged, we discern the Dignity of our Nature, and the Capacity we have of exalting it and qualifying ourselves for a State infinitely more elevated than that of the greatest or of the wifest Mortal. Such are the Pleasures of occasional Solitude, and fure they are fufficient to engage a Man of Sense and Judgment to court them as often as he conveni-

Those who fansy that Solitude is naturally productive of Melancholy, and who can never disjoin the Ideas of being alone and being uneasy, have never had a true Notion of the Requisites to Solitude. As a Man cannot frequent publick Places without a competent Stock of good Sense, good Manners, and good Breeding, so it is absolutely impossible that a Man should ever have a Taste for Solitude, I mean occasionally only, without Judgment, Learning and Experience. It a Person is so heedless (or which rarely happens) is so unfortunate as to want a Power of comparing, discerning and reslecting on Events; if a Man never had an Education which qualify'd him for Study, or is not old enough or observant enough to make his Memory serve him instead of Books; then it is in vain to think of relishing Solitude. A Man without Teeth might as well pretend to pick Bones; but where these Qualities are not wanting, questionless the withdrawing now and then from the common Business of Life, and in Silence and Solitude looking into ourselves, is equally useful and entertaining.

It would be no difficult Task to enumerate many Uses consequent from this Practice; to avoid Prolixity let us state only a few. In the first Place, Man is his own ablest Tutor, Solitude obliges us to meditate, Meditation is the direct Road of Knowledge. Reading acquaints us only with the Opinions of others, Meditating shews us things as they are in Nature, or at least appear by the Light of Reason; much Reading may make a Scholar without Judgment, much Thinking, a Scholar without Books. In the next, it is a firong Guard to Innocence; a Person who is afraid of Solitude must be afraid of Sin. A Man cannot be alone without examining himself, and this Examination, in case he is a bad Man, must produce fuch Accusations as will quickly compel him either to abandon his Vices, or to lose all Relish for Solitude. Thirdly, it is the most expeditions Way of knowing the World. For as we frame a better Conception of the Form and Extent of London by looking on a good Map or Profpect of it than we could by running up and down it, fo, in respect to the Moral World, Confideration and Reflection will do much more towards forming a true Notion of it than Company and Conversation. What farther Recommendations then can be requifite to a Practice which tends to make Mankind wise, good, and every way valuable in Society.

That Solitude may be made pleasant, and such Retreats as these Recreations, to Men of Sense and ingenious Spiris, may appear from hence. The thing which gives Life and Lustre to the most diverting Books is the entering into Human Nature, and painting the Passions from the Heart. This is the secret Charm in Don Quixote, Montaigne's Essays and the Tatlers. In Solitude every Man may be this way his own favourite Author, and may make more Discoveries in human Nature in one Week's Inspection of his own Breast, than in Years by pursuing what has been descried and described by others. But it may be objected, that a Man cannot be delighted with the View of his own Foibles. For either he must perceive them and so mend them, or else he must be partial towards them, and then he cannot discern their Folly. But Reason and Experience disprove this. Indiscretions, Failings, Slips, &c. are incident to Man as Mao, and the very correcting some will lead a Man into others. Remarks on these are always full of Amusement, and the very best Memoirs become so by the frequent occurring of such Particulars. It is the Duty of every Man to endeavour to be as persect as he can, but to think of arriving at Persection is what never enters a wise Man's Head. Just as we use all Endeavours to live as long as we can, without dreaming of Immortality. The Observations necessary to this will imperceptibly give us the History of Human Nature.

SIR, Wednefday, July 23, 1740.

IN the London Evening Post of last Night, there is the following Paragraph:

We hear several Important Negociations are carrying on at Paris, by the Potentaies of the Theatrick Dominions of Drury-Lane and Count-Garden, in order to engage a famous French Dancing Woods into their Alliance ; but notwithflanding all the] Addresse of their Plenipoes, the French Lady, like . the French Cardinal, keeps to a Neutrality, till fhe finds it more for ber Intereft to break te.

The infipid duli Fellow aims at Political Hum ur in this Paragraph. Were the Facts true, and his Application just, I think there can be found little or to Humour at all in them : But as they are falle in every Particular, you should deign to correct him a little for his Impertinence.
